

UPROAR IN THE ASSEMBLY.

WILD SCENE OF FIBERSTERNING AT THE NIGHT SESSION.

Mr. Fish tries to get in a resolution for an investigating committee in opposition to the Passett Committee. The Republican members, aided by the Speaker, try to get the House to pass a resolution.

ALBANY, May 7.—The legislative business of the day, but the day was not especially important. The accompanying hum of political work was more important. It culminated toward midnight in a wild scene of filibustering and confusion in the Assembly. The Rapid Transit Conference Committee, meeting at odd times during the day, and a caucus of the Republican Senators late to-night were incidents in the political work of the day. The latter was to try and drive into the reluctant Senators on the Collins and the Hamilton Street, and incidentally to discuss the several other puzzling problems that confront the Republicans in the control of the majority of the Legislature. The Rapid Transit Conference seemed likely at times to reach a basis of compromise. The addition of the names of the Mayor's commission, two of them Republicans, and one a Democrat, to the proposition on which the opposite parties had a chance of meeting. But all interest in these points was lost when the grand row in the Assembly broke out, and the majority of the House on old lines of combination became a question of order and discipline.

It was an unprovoked sort of a tie up. It started in on a motion by Mr. Fish to take a recess of five minutes and reconvene in the order of motions and resolutions. The Speaker and the majority of the House, however, would not take the motion. Mr. Fish's purpose was to introduce his long-contemplated resolution for an Assembly investigating committee to get back into and neutralize the effect of the Passett investigating committee. The particular object of investigation for the committee would be of course, the departments in which Mr. Platt and his friends have held office or been interested. The Speaker's face hardened. He grasped his gavel with a firm grip, and called for a drink of water at the hands of the regulars. The Speaker's face hardened.
